School board seeking new 9.9-mill tax

St. Landry voters will decide May 16 on a 9.9-mill property tax increase proposed by the parish school board. Superintendent Milton Batiste III said the tax would be used to fund a $2,500 salary increase for all 1,700 school employees, address a backlog of deferred maintenance, fund added school security measures, and allow hiring of nurses, counselors and support staff.

In an open letter to parish voters, Batiste described the proposal as “a critical opportunity to invest in the future of our children, our schools, and our entire community” that is “designed to establish a sustainable funding stream to address critical needs in safety, staff compensation, and competitive student performance programs.”

The plan also includes installation of tracks and football/soccer fields at six high schools and an auditorium at the Magnet Academy for Cultural Arts in Opelousas.

Batiste noted that It has been 40 years since voters last approved a new school millage and that “everything has increased dramatically, yet our operational budget has largely remained frozen in time.”

Parish voters soundly rejected three larger school millage proposals in March 2022

Inspection found bridge scouring

Although the Bayou Carron bridge is the younger of our two Main Street bridges, engineers deemed it most in need of replacement. The work now underway was spurred by an inspection that showed water washing around the foundations has caused “critical” scouring.

The Bayou Carron bridge was built in 1962. The Bayou Courtableau bridge was completed in 1936. According to its most current inspection report, “All primary structural elements are sound” and the foundations stable.

About 1,200 vehicles cross each bridge daily.

Washington awoke to a dusting of snow on January 26, but freezing rain accompanying an Arctic front that pushed into the state January 24 stopped just short of us. We did see overnight freezes and wind chills in the teens for almost a week.

Mayor to appoint home rule charter panel

The Town Council gave Mayor Dwight Landreneau authority to appoint a Home Rule Charter Commission to review the document adopted in November 2010. The current charter was drafted by a seven-member commission and approved by Washington voters. Any changes to it will also have to be approved in an election.

The charter gives the town some authority that would otherwise belong to the legislature. Until its adoption, Washington operated under the Lawrason Act, which gives the legislature power over many local matters.

Since its adoption there has been some discussion about several items, particularly selection of the police chief. The charter now provides that the chief "shall be elected" and that he or she "shall have actually resided" within the town limits for a year before taking office. Questions have been raised about how many people living in town have the qualifications and background for the job. Suggestions include expanding the area from which a chief can be chosen and/or allowing the mayor to make the selection with approval by the Council.

Challenged district will likely be used

Washington will likely remain in the new majority-Black 6th congressional district for the 2026 midterm elections if the U.S. Supreme Court does not rule soon on a challenge to its makeup. Qualifying for the state's new party primary system has been moved from July to February 11-13, and candidates will already have been selected if the court does not rule before then.

Voting in the party primaries is set for May 16, runoffs will be on June 27, and the general election will be November 3. Incumbent Democrat Cleo Fields is expected to run again.

Under the old open primary system, all candidates appeared on the same ballot, regardless of party affiliation, and any voter could choose any of them. Under the new system registered Republicans and Democrats will be able to vote only in their party's primary. No-party voters will be able to pick which primary they want to vote in, but those affiliated with a party other than Democrat or Republican will be eligible to vote only in the general election.

1953 rains brought flood control to Courtableau

Just before noon on April 28, 1956, engineers opened a heavy steel floodgate to let water from Bayou Courtableau flow into the Atchafalaya Basin, ending an “intensive effort “ to stop flooding on Bayou Courtableau. That effort began after heavy rains caused the bayou to rise to its highest recorded level, 35.29 feet on May 22, 1953.

The bayou had already been described as “treacherous” before 8½ inches of rain fell on Washington on May 17. More than 500 people had to be evacuated from Washington, Beggs, Dubuisson, and Garland. The road to LeBeau went under water a day later, and trains quit running after “workmen, who had been feverishly sand bagging approaches to a trestle about a mile north of Washington, were forced to give up as the banks collapsed,” according to the Opelousas Daily World.

That flood prompted the “intensive effort” headed by former congressman Henry Larcade, who’s call for controls got through the federal bureaucracy relatively quickly. He said quick action was needed because, “we are liable to get a repetition of those terrible rains [that will] put us under water again.”

The engineers unveiled a $1.7 million plan in May 1954 to build five floodgates where Bayou Courtableau meets the West Atchafalaya Floodway levee about a mile south of Highway 190. The gates that Senator Long helped open two years later are designed to let water out of the bayou when it gets too high and into it when it is too low.

The Courtableau is now maintained at an average of about 18 feet at the gauge on the Washington Main Street bridge, which measures the height of the bayou above sea level, not the actual depth of the bayou. The lowest level recorded here is 10.72 feet on October 18, 1956.
